Rhythms of life was a travelling exhibition all about the wonders of nature's clocks and how they affect everything from sleep to migration, mating to the flowering of plants. The exhibition was informal and fun, using simple materials such as bamboo and vibrant cartoon-style illustrations with models and specimens to communicate the science of life to the target audience - families with 7-12 year olds.

During its 10-month stay at The Natural History Museum, Rhythms of Life inspired over 400,000 school children through a series of workshops designed specifically for the exhibition.
